So strong and so general was this erroneous impression, originating in pure ignorance of the laws of Political Economy, that when railways were coming into operation and horses by thousands were required more than before, we had to go abroad for a supply, because horse-breeding had been largely given up. But it was soon found that for every coach with its teams, etc., wanted in the olden time, scores were demanded for the traffic which sprang up between the numerous Stations erected along the different lines, and the adjoining towns and country. More coaches, more drivers, more horses, more cattle-dealers, more stable-keepers, etc., were called for, and, therefore, more graziers, more customers to the farmer for oats and hay, more farriers, more coach-builders--besides the host of porters, clerks, labourers, engineers, navvies, coal and iron miners called into action by railways, and through the impetus given to every industry by the new channels they opened up for trade. Labour was saved, --employment multiplied. 5. The first thing which strikes the observer, after the successful introduction of a Machine to replace manual by mechanical labour, is that numbers of workers are thrown out of work. The mule, or spinningjenny, swept away thousands of spinning-wheels; the spinster s work was gone. So the knitters and the handloom weavers disappeared before the stocking-frame and the power-loom. The fact presses itself upon the public notice; and Machinery is at once...
