Excerpt: . . . 11 Finally, and perhaps most importantly, education reform must feature account-ability. This includes both student accountability and adult accountability. Since the class of 2003, passing the 10th-grade MCAS in both English and Math has been a graduation requirement, and we now have 96 of our high school stu-dents reaching that goal. If I had to single out one feature that has played the greatest role in mobilizing our system and focusing attention on academic achieve-ment, particularly in disadvantaged districts, this would be it. We faced a lot of op-position, particularly from the teachers unions and some suburban districts, when we first implemented the test as a graduation requirement, but thanks to a firm bipartisan commitment by Democratic legislative leaders and Republican governors, we stayed the course. This took some guts - and a lot of faith in our students and teachers - because the early pilot test results were not promising. As this chart shows, half the students were failing the math exam. But in the run-up to 2001, when the 10th-grade tests started counting for graduation, things changed. Students and teachers focused their efforts; schools changed practices in myriad ways, including such measures as double-blocks in math and English. The state appropriated tens of millions of dol-lars for remedial programs - including after-school and summer programs - to make up for deficiencies that existed before standards took hold. The result of this con-certed effort was a dramatic improvement, particularly in our...
