Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .contagion ordinarily extends is singularly small (p. 574). It appears to me that this conclusion, at any rate so far as direct infection from mouth to mouth is concerned, is justified by the following considerations: --a. That the statistical evidence for such infection is almost valueless. For it has been shown that the number of cases of supposed infection falls short of what it should be, even on the hypothesis that the disease is not contagious (see the result of the application of Dr. Longstaffs formula, in the Collective Investigation Record ). b. That most, if not all, the cases recorded are placed out of court by the impossibility of ascertaining that they were due to direct infection, and that they did not arise from the presence in the dwellings of tuberculous material under the form of dust. c. That if phthisis be directly conveyed from person to person, it is difficult to see why it should be affected by the nature of the subsoil of dwellings; and why its prevalence should be so greatly diminished by a decrease in the wetness of soil. d. That the influence of altitude upon the disease presents difficulties similar to the last. e. That, if the simple contagion theory were true, hospitals for consumption should have been, at any rate in the past, centres and hotbeds of infection; but the universal testimony of physicians to these institutions is that no conveyance of the disease can be traced, in any...
